That great disasters and calamities in different parts of the world have occurred with such unusual frequence withn the past year as to rather overtax the charitable and humanitarian spirit of the American people, in responding to cries for relief, is the opinfon of officials of the American Branch of the National Red Cross, as expressed yesterday, This view is formulated in the face

Last winter, within a few weeks after the call of the Red Cross, without the aid of a proclamation from the President, for contributions to relieve sufferers of the famine in Japan, several times the sum of $14,000 had been contributed; ontributions came in more liberally for relief of the sufferers from the eruption of Vesuvius last spring. The San Francisco horror was different, of course, being nearer at home, and contributions for that cause rapidly ran up into the hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Dregs of Funds Reached.

The Red Cross did not appeal for conributions to aid the sufferers of the famine in Russia and the earthquake and fire disaster in Kingston. It is well that they did not, for it would have brought little response, as the American people seem to ave reached the dregs of their funds for such humanitarian relief work in different parts of the world. Even the religious peoples of the country, who are always the first to come forward with their con-tributions, have reached a halt, for the born in Petersburg, Va. religious papers that are appealing weekly and daily for aid are meeting with little or no response; clergymen who appeal personally from the pulpit to their congregations are receiving less encouragement than ordinarily they would for funds to aid the mission work in "enlightening the heathen of interior China," just where the famine and flood have wrought their worst fearful devastation.
